Teamwork is vital to the success of any wound care clinic. Each member has its own discrete and important role to play. Each person, nurse, therapist, general practitioner and medical specialist has a valuable individual and collective contribution to make towards improving healthcare, wound care and the patient experience of having a well treated wound.

The importance of good education and teamwork must not be underestimated to ensure continuity in quality care and the use of high standards of care.

Sharing reliable knowledge and scientific evidence based information further than the own discipline underpins good health-care practice and guarantees long term high quality care.

Multidisciplinary education proves to be the best way to obtain multidisciplinary teamwork.
